PRESIDENT'S PROFILE

Board of Governors Presidential Profile - Anthony Napolitano '03

Anthony Napolitano has shown great commitment to the Loyola community over the years—as an undergrad at Loyola Marymount University (LMU), as a law student at Loyola Law School and as an active member of the alumni associations of both institutions. Most recently, he has taken on another role: the newly elected president of the Law School's Alumni Association Board of Governors.

Napolitano sees the Law School's alumni as among its greatest assets, and strengthening communication within the alumni community is his main priority. Napolitano explains, "I wanted to become president of the Board of Governors to help our alumni reconnect with their alma mater and to reconnect with each other. Our alumni community is large in number and in prominence, and alumni are a valuable resource for networking, mentoring and professional opportunities." He plans to increase alumni use of Loyola Connect, a comprehensive online directory, networking resource and communications tool.

In addition to advancing professional and networking opportunities, Napolitano hopes to bolster alumni involvement in community service activities. "Giving back to those less fortunate is very important to me," says Napolitano. "As president of the board, I plan to implement more opportunities for our alumni to participate in service activities, such as volunteering at soup kitchens or building and repairing houses and schools in underprivileged neighborhoods."

Napolitano practices financial restructuring law at Buchalter Nemer, PC, and he is a certified public accountant. He served as articles editor of the Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review and has bachelor's degrees in accounting and economics. He adds, "My wife also graduated from LMU. We met while attending orientation at the Law School, and our two children attend LMU's Children's Center on the Westchester campus, so we are a true Loyolan family."

Professor Scott Wood (left), director of Loyola's Center for Restorative Justice, with Franky Carrillo, who spoke to students about his recent release from prison after being incarcerated for 20 years for a murder he did not commit.

Loyola's Center for Restorative Justice

Loyola Law School's Center for Restorative Justice (CRJ) is already making an impact on campus and throughout the community. The CRJ is helping bring about a shift from a punitive to a restorative paradigm of justice. This important movement in the criminal justice system emphasizes offender accountability to the victim and the community, rather than punishment, and fosters reintegration of the offender back into society. It also alleviates some of the chronic problems of the criminal justice system, such as overcrowding and recidivism. Restorative justice is popular in several prisons and juvenile facilities but is not yet fostered in many law schools. In fact, Loyola is currently the only law school on the West Coast to have a center focused on the restorative justice movement.

The functions of the CRJ can be separated into three prongs: education, practicum and community programs. Education is provided to students through a semester-long seminar. Students are taught the basics of restorative justice on a theoretical, practical and critical level, and are encouraged to consider new possibilities of reform. Seth Weiner '10 enrolled in the seminar during his second year at Loyola Law School. "The seminar was packed with powerful concepts, guest speakers and discussion among the students and professors. I learned about alternative dispute resolution, conflict resolution and community mediations," recalls Weiner. His dedication to this movement contributed to Weiner earning a fellowship to work for the center, where he now teaches the Restorative Justice Seminar with Clinical Professor and CRJ Director Scott Wood, and works to continue the development of the center.

"It has always been the practice at the Law School to provide our students with both in-class instruction and real-life experience," says Wood. "We knew that for the Center for Restorative Justice to truly have an impact on our community, we needed to get our students involved, hands-on." The center's semester-long practicum, in cooperation with Centinela Youth Services (CYS), Inc., trains select students to work in its Victim Offender Restitution Services (VORS), where juvenile offenders and the victims are brought together for dialog. "Our students work alongside other professionals to monitor this meeting," says Wood. "The interaction between the offender and the victim can be powerful and healing for both parties. The victim has a chance to be heard, and the offender gets a better understanding of the harm caused by the offense." The VORS program is a real-life application of what restorative justice is all about—taking a conflict, crime or hurt and changing it into a healing.

Both Wood and Weiner see the center as a hub on campus and beyond. "We have several natural allies at the Law School with other centers," explains Wood. The center often collaborates with the Center for Juvenile Law and Policy, the Human Rights Watch and the Center for Conflict Resolution. Off campus, the CRJ is able to have greater impact on the community by working alongside such groups as the Jesuit Restorative Justice Initiative, Homeboy Industries, Street Poets, the Archdiocese of Los Angeles, CYS and more.

Through community programming, we hope to provide a holistic picture of the problems and solutions facing everyone involved in our criminal justice system."

"Through community programming, we hope to provide a holistic picture of the problems and solutions facing everyone involved in our criminal justice system," says Wood. On June 3-4, 2011, the center will host its first conference, "Another Way: Restorative Justice for Youth." This interdisciplinary conference will open the lines of communication between the different entities responsible for reform in the local juvenile justice system, including judges, lawyers, law enforcement, and mental health and social workers.

"Los Angeles has a notoriously overburdened juvenile justice system," says Wood. "Recent reform led to improvement, but with 40,000 juveniles arrested annually in Los Angeles, there is still a need for change." And with Loyola's commitment to public interest work and the restorative justice movement sharing roots in the Jesuit tradition, this center is perfectly positioned to facilitate great change.

There are several ways to support the CRJ and the great work it does on campus and throughout the community. To donate, learn more about the center or for information about upcoming events, visit www.lls.edu/CRJ or contact Scott Wood at scott.wood@lls.edu or Seth Weiner at seth.weiner@lls.edu.

INTRODUCING

The Advocacy Institute at Loyola

Message from the Dean

Loyola excels at turning students into real lawyers. In fact, many of the top trial lawyers in the nation are Loyola alumni. More than 200 of our grads currently preside as trial court judges in Southern California—more than any other law school. Loyola student advocacy teams regularly win regional, national and even international awards. Our advocacy curriculum is the broadest available, our advocacy professors are the best in the business, and our facilities, including courtrooms and instructional technology, are second to none.

A great program is now even better. Our new Advocacy Institute will give the next generation of Loyola students the practical skills demanded by this tough job market. Students will receive training directly from leading trial lawyers and judges. Because our students will be taught by the best, they will acquire more than practical skills. Loyola students will also learn that good lawyers uphold the highest standards of ethics, believe passionately in justice, and devote themselves to the service of others.

THE ADVOCACY INSTITUTE INCLUDES:

- Concentration programs in Civil Litigation and Criminal Trial Practice
- Advanced courses during and between every academic semester
- Enhanced clinical opportunities, including a semester in practice
- Mentoring and networking opportunities with leading trial lawyers
- Participation in advocacy competitions in the U.S. and around the world
- An enormous array of programs serving students and the community.

The pressures of the new economy challenge us to constantly improve. The traditional way of teaching law students is a thing of the past.
