Spring 2013

The Loyola Law School community added another important alumni group to its ranks in the month of February. The Health Law Alumni Chapter officially launched on Feb. 9, 2013 during a well-attended kickoff celebration in the Burns Lounge on campus.

Professor Brietta Clark, who organized the event, said she was thrilled with the turnout and response, adding that a number of alumni "expressed their gratitude and excitement about the creation of the chapter and wanted to know when the next event would be."

Steven Goby '89, in-house counsel at L.A. Care Health Plan in Los Angeles, received the inaugural Alumni Mentor Award for his tremendous public service and mentorship to students and alumni. Many of Goby's former and current mentees were in attendance.

David Blake '92, vice president of corporate compliance at Cedars-Sinai, and Vince Farhat '96, a partner at Holland & Knight in Los Angeles, were also recognized for their important contributions to the health law program as adjunct professors.

The new alumni chapter was launched at the urging of current Health Law and Bioethics Association (HLBA) student leaders Jenny Jiao '13, Renee Kimm '13, David Lancaster '13, Puja Shah '13 and William Yee '13.

Since 2004, the HLBA has focused on promoting awareness and career opportunities in health law among Loyola students. As the implementation of health care reform unfolds, it also organizes events to inform students about related legal issues.

Professor Clark speaks to many young alumni, especially those new to the health law field, who are excited about the networking opportunities the chapter provides. "They view it as a great way to reach out to more experienced alumni for support and mentoring," Clark said, "particularly in the face of new challenges and uncertainty created by health care reform implementation."

LOYOLA LAUNCHES HEALTH LAW ALUMNI CHAPTER

Clark said the group offers an avenue for experienced alumni to reconnect with the Law School and give back by mentoring students while also receiving professional development as demand increases for health law attorneys. The Health Law Alumni Chapter will also facilitate career networking for current students through experiential learning opportunities with alumni, who have played a critical role in making government and in-house externships available to Loyola students. Traditionally, these positions have been few and far between. For instance, Goby oversaw students working in the Licensing Division of the Department of Managed Health Care, while Grace Oh '99 and Julien Kern '10 placed Loyola students in positions at Children's Hospital Los Angeles.

Additionally, Annie Hsu Shieh '09, senior compliance counsel at Central Health Plan, started a Health Law Externship and Summer Internship program at her company a few years ago. Since then, the program has hosted four talented Loyola students who have returned to the externship for multiple semesters.

The Central Health Plan program is the first placement at a for-profit health care company available to Loyola students for course credit. Based on its success, Loyola is looking to expand Health Law Practicum opportunities to in-house legal departments at other health care companies and to health law firms. In addition to the Health Law Practicum, the Law School is offering a new student program, the Health Care Law Course of Study. The Course of Study Program is designed for students interested in learning about the legal regulation of health care access, quality and cost. The program acts as a guide for students with these interests to structure their paths through law school and into their future careers.

Alumni interested in joining the Health Law Alumni Chapter should visit alumni.lls.edu and log on to Loyola Connect, Loyola's secure, password-protected alumni online directory. Once you've logged in, be sure to select health law as an area of practice to receive information about future chapter events and notable developments.

Alumni interested in learning more about the chapter or joining the group's advisory board are welcome to contact Professor Brietta Clark at 213.736.1494 or Brietta.Clark@lls.edu.

Cy Pres Awards Support Loyola Students and Public Interest Efforts

Loyola continues to maintain an active presence in the Los Angeles community through its many non-profit centers and programs. LLS students have long incorporated social justice and equal rights advocacy into their law school careers. This is made possible by the tireless work of professors, staff and alumni in building a network of opportunities throughout the city for students to get involved.

One way to further enhance Loyola's ability to make a difference in the lives of L.A. residents is through the support of cy pres funds. Since 1986, California courts have distributed unclaimed class-action settlement funds, known as cy pres awards, to third-party non-profits whose mission indirectly benefits the plaintiffs and advances the public interest in areas such as consumer protection.

Dean Victor Gold recognizes the tremendous impact that cy pres awards have had on many of the Law School's efforts to provide students with practical training to build lawyering skills while helping a variety of underserved populations in our community. "There's virtually no class-action lawsuit that wouldn't connect to something we do here at Loyola," he said.

“We have a long tradition of public interest here, and we're really great at working in underserved communities because so many of our students are really connected to local communities and want to give back.”

Gold pointed to the Center for Law and Genocide, the Thomas V. Girardi Chair in Consumer Protection Law and fellowships for current and post-graduate students as key areas where cy pres funding has made a difference. Gold said the awards have either funded the programs in total or "made it possible for us to expand and do things we couldn't otherwise have done."

Clinical Professor Sande Buhai, director of Loyola's Public Interest Law Department, noted that any new cy pres awards would allow the school to fund more public-interest fellowships in the Los Angeles area. Loyola currently funds around 100 summer fellowships at a cost of $3,500 per student. Several fellows choose to work at the Santa Monica-based Consumer Watchdog and L.A.'s Center for Health Care Rights, both of which are very active in the area of consumer protection. Buhai feels it's important not to underestimate the community impact a law student can make, even over the summer.

Additionally, cy pres awards could be used to fund more of Loyola's two-year, post-graduate public interest fellowships, which cost $60,000 per student. Buhai added that Loyola's philosophy, particularly its pro-bono requirement, makes the school and its students uniquely suited to maximize cy pres awards. "We have a long tradition of public interest here, and we're really great at working in underserved communities because so many of our students are really connected to local communities and want to give back."

Gold agreed, urging alumni to help direct cy pres funds toward the law school if they can. "It's really a win-win for consumers, students and for the legal profession."

Danielle Criona '99 2013 President Alumni Association Board of Governors

Danielle Criona '99 not only brings 13 years of practice in intellectual property law to her Loyola Law School Alumni Association Board of Governors presidency in 2013, she carries a strong personal bond with the school.

"It feels like an extended family," Criona said. "I love Loyola and always have."

The California native is a member of the exclusive "double alum" club, having earned her bachelor's degree at Loyola Marymount University in Biology and Biochemistry, along with her JD from the Law School. In between, the Renaissance woman got her master's in Biology at California State University, Northridge and worked as a research scientist and regulatory compliance specialist at a local biotechnology company while enrolled in Loyola's Evening Program.

Criona says board members have probably already noticed she's brought the same type of dedication she had for her education to her role as president. "I have a very strong work ethic," Criona said. "I want people to work together as a team and use their collective imaginations to better the alumni association."

As senior intellectual property counsel for Roll Global, Criona oversees international enforcement of all national and international trademark and copyright issues associated with worldwide brands such as FIJI Water, Wonderful Pistachios, Cuties (Mandarins), POM Wonderful products, Teleflora (floral delivery service) and JUSTIN Wines, along with many others.

The veteran federal litigator is used to arguing patent, trademark and copyright infringement claims in court and advising clients on how to maximize their IP portfolios. She says her people skills have helped make the transition into her new position on the Board of Governors a little easier.

"You have to respect that these board members are giving their time outside of their jobs," Criona said. "We all have to rally around the common effort."

The board is achieving its goals this year by creating more sub-committees and inviting non-board members to serve on those committees in order to increase efficiency as well as getting more alumni involved with the Law School. The board continues to focus its efforts on growing alumni participation in its Attorneys for Others service programs. The program is also open to Loyola students, which will advance Criona's top priority of connecting alumni and students through service opportunities.

"We're trying to involve both alumni and students so that they get to know each other," Criona said. "I want students to graduate with a sense of belonging to an alumni network, instead of trying to join up after they graduate."
