Tradition of Advocacy Continues to Grow

to do anything that's going to cost our students any more money or keep them out of the workforce any longer than necessary," he said.

This year, the Law School welcomed two new practical-training programs, the Immigrants' Rights Practicum and the Center for Restorative Justice, to provide students with an increased level of specialized training without additional cost. The Immigrants' Rights Practicum, created by Associate Professor Kathleen C. Kim, partners with the National Immigration Law Center to educate students about the tenets of immigration law before sending them to various public-interest firms with solid immigration practices. This spring, the program's first eight students will begin externships at some of the most prominent immigrants' rights organizations in the nation, including the American Civil Liberties Union, Asian Pacific American Legal Center and the Esperanza Immigrants Rights Project.

"Loyola couldn't be in a better position to take on a project like this," said Kim. "We are literally in the geographic center of immigration rights work." Kim expressed that the program meets the demands of a growing number of students who plan to devote their careers to immigration work. "What makes this program so wonderful is that these students really came to school for immigration rights," said Kim. "A lot of our students come from immigrant families themselves, have their own stories of immigrant migration or grew up with their families' stories."

Professor Scott E. Wood formed the Center for Restorative Justice after attending a conference of California's Jesuit institutions. The organization requested that all member institutions teach students about non-retributive approaches to crime and punishment—concepts such as fair-sentencing laws, prison healing circles and victim restitution. The program begins with a seminar exploring the principles of non-punitive punishment to resolve conflict and repair emotional damage for both victims and perpetrators of crime.

Wood also provides students the opportunity to work on several restorative projects, such as the Fair Sentencing for Youth Project, a non-profit dedicated to changing mandatory sentencing laws for men and women who are serving life sentences for crimes committed in their youth. His plans ultimately call for a victims' rights clinic on campus that will have students provide services for crime victims and their families, such as helping them track cases as they move through the legal system. "My goal is to have every Loyola student complete restorative justice training," Wood said. "I know this is a program that will stick with students whether they decide to go into criminal law or not. The focus of any case they will ever have is about broken relationships and the need to repair them."

Loyola also has plans for another ambitious advocacy project. In fall 2010, Loyola will open the Alarcon Center, a capital habeas litigation program that will pair students with criminal defense attorneys working on appeals in death-row cases. Named in recognition of the Hon. Arthur L. Alarcon, senior circuit judge with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, the center also aims to train new lawyers to work capital cases. "I think there will be a phenomenal interest among students and new lawyers. They are hungry to do something that matters in real life," said Professor Laurie Levenson, who will oversee the Alarcon Center.

For Gold, the addition of the Alarcon Center will be another stepping stone paving the way toward his vision for the future. "My secret goal is for Loyola to be the number one school for advocacy in the country," he said. "I guess it's not a secret anymore."

Two Endowed Chairs Launched to Honor Loyola Leaders

During their long tenures at Loyola Law School, Professor William G. Coskran '59 and Dean Frederick J. Lower, Jr. '64, both graduates of Loyola Marymount University (LMU) and Loyola Law School, often strolled the campus together, debating everything from the fundamentals of a legal education to the best way to serve students in a changing world. So it only seemed natural that the legendary professor with a passion for surfing and the distinguished former dean should receive Loyola's highest honor together. In the fall of 2009, Loyola announced the establishment of two endowed chairs in the professors' names. These chairs will allow Loyola to retain and recruit top professors to the campus within the next year whose quality will reflect that of their namesakes.

Dean Lower, a former Marine Corps officer, 1956 graduate of LMU and 1964 graduate of Loyola Law School, was twice selected to lead the Law School. Lower, who joined the faculty as an adjunct professor in 1966 and went on to become Loyola's 10th dean in 1973, took the lead in planning campus expansion and reaching out for the considerable financial resources to build it. During his six years as dean, additional land was procured and the world-renowned Frank Gehry became the campus architect. Lower also created 15 alumni chapters throughout the country and formed the school's Board of Visitors (now the Board of Overseers), which consists of members of the legal and business community who offer the dean assistance with outreach and fund-raising. In 1990, he agreed to serve as interim dean when the current dean left suddenly to run for governor. As Ken Ott, associate dean for advancement, noted, "This is a man who stepped up to help the school in critical times."

In 1991, Lower said goodbye to Loyola to begin a new life as a Los Angeles County Superior Court judge. "Fred Lower had his hand in leading our law school for over 40 years. He served as dean during a most important and critical time in the school's development. He has also been a mentor for all subsequent deans," said David W. Burcham '84, the executive vice president and provost of LMU

Tradition of Advocacy Continues to Grow

When Adam Grant '10 joined Loyola Law School's Innocence Project, he was eager to leave the safety of the classroom behind for a bit of real-world action. But the fourth-year evening student did not know just how real that action would be until he was sitting inside a Southern California prison, interviewing a hardened felon who was a reluctant witness to a 15-year-old murder that may have sent an innocent man to prison.

That's when it hit Grant: "This is not like class, where we are studying what has already been resolved. Everything we do out here in the field impacts an actual defendant," said Grant. "This might be our one chance to get an innocent person out of prison for something we are convinced the convicted party didn't do."

Grant is one of three Loyola students who spent the fall semester working in tandem with the Northern California Innocence Project on a habeas petition to free a client they believe received an unfair trial. In addition to drafting petitions and strategizing with attorneys, the trio fanned out across the region, interviewing anyone with insight into the case. "These guys have talked to everyone from pimps to police," said Professor Laurie Levenson, holder of the David W. Burcham Chair in Ethical Advocacy, who oversees the students. "It doesn't get more hands on than that." And that's the whole idea.

Loyola has long been committed to providing students a unique, stimulating education with a strong emphasis on experiential learning. Here, faculty and administrators measure success by how fast graduates hit the ground running as first-year attorneys. "Loyola students are not the type to be content to sit back and accept a passive education or rest on their laurels," said Dean Victor J. Gold. "They are hungry to be heard and make their mark." To that end, all Loyola students are encouraged to supplement their class work with seminars, workshops, externships and professional-development groups.

Levenson's Innocence Project is just one of several advocacy programs of its kind at Loyola designed to give students real-world lawyering experience. From the widely praised Center for Juvenile Law and Policy, which allows students to serve as counsel for minors in the Los Angeles juvenile justice system, to new initiatives focused on immigration and restorative justice, Loyola provides a multitude of opportunities for students to become more involved with advocacy and social justice.

With a steadily growing number of such programs, Gold recently announced the fall 2010 opening of an Advocacy Institute to serve as a headquarters for these practical-training initiatives. Under one roof, advocacy programs and their faculty leaders will be able to easily share information and collaborate on new projects and programs. The institute will be led by an administrator and a board of directors made up of both faculty and alumni.

My secret goal is for Loyola to be the number one school for advocacy in the country."

"We have alumni who really are the leaders in trial advocacy. These are nationally prominent trial lawyers who are considered to be leaders in the field everywhere you go," he said. "And we need to take advantage of their connection to this school and all they can offer our students." And because of Loyola's rich tradition of turning out top trial advocates, Gold says he is also exploring the idea of offering certificate programs for students who want to graduate with an emphasis in civil, criminal trial or appellate advocacy.

Interested students would have to complete a specific course-load. "This program would not be for everyone," he said. "But we have such a wealth of programming and courses, it makes sense to take it to the next level and create a curriculum for our students with a certificate that notes the student has a special focus and they've gone above and beyond," he said. Gold feels a certificate program made more sense than adding specialized LLM programs, especially in a tight economy. "We don't want and the 15th dean of Loyola Law School. "A chair in his name will celebrate his contributions as a distinguished leader and professor."

Two Endowed Chairs Launched to Honor Loyola Leaders

William (Bill) G. Coskran's ties to Loyola were forged when the young man pursued an undergraduate degree at LMU and then went on to Loyola Law School, graduating first in his class in 1959. Coskran spent two years working for the U.S. Air Force J.A.G. department. In 1962, he entered private practice focusing on real property and construction law. Soon, he was back at the Law School as an adjunct professor and began teaching full time in 1968.

Coskran maintained a reputation as a universally respected and admired teacher of Property who would often enchant his students and fellow faculty members with tales of riding the waves on his surfboard. "As part of a faculty known for great teaching, Bill Coskran was perhaps the finest teacher of them all," said Dean Victor J. Gold. "What made Bill nothing less than a classroom legend was his unmatched ability to help his students understand and apply the most difficult aspects of law to a concrete set of facts. No one has ever been better at performing the magic of turning students into lawyers."

Generations of first-year students were captivated by Coskran's teaching style, and he motivated many to push on through the grueling year ahead. "He was almost immeasurably good, unbelievably good," said Loyola Professor Allan Ides '79, who holds the Christopher N. May Chair. "Going to his class was one of the most engaging things you could do. He captivated the class and pushed us really hard, but he was always nice, always available outside the classroom."

Ides said it was Coskran who inspired him to pursue a teaching career of his own. "I was completely influenced by him. He had no PowerPoint, no special effects. It was all him and the chalkboard. He was completely dedicated in a completely unpretentious way," Ides said. "I'd love to think I'm something like that." Though he retired in 1995, Coskran continues to teach part time as a professor emeritus and has many friends and supporters on campus thrilled to honor him with a chair in his name.

Conceived by an anonymous visionary in the Roman Empire, endowed chairs reward excellent teachers and scholars and indicate the depth and stability of an educational institution. In the United States, the first endowed chair was established at Harvard University in 1721. Loyola received its first endowed chair in 1983 and has since collected 10 more.

The majority of Loyola's chairs were funded in just the last six years as a result of the school's highly successful drive to boost its endowment. At Loyola, endowed chairs continue to help retain and recruit top faculty, who will raise the level of outstanding teaching and scholarship for all faculty for years to come.
